Two-column page: read the left column first, then the right

Left column. The first column describes the shoreline in the morning, when mist stands on the water and the far bank is only a suggestion of darker grey.

It continues with the boats drawn up on the gravel, each one turned over to keep the rain out, their keels in a row like the spines of closed books.

Right column. The second column takes up the afternoon, when the wind comes round to the west and the water breaks into small bright pieces that will not hold still.

By evening the two columns meet again in the same quiet, and a reader who followed both has walked the whole day along the shore.
